ALPHABETICAL LIST OF FEDERAL WORLD WAR AGENCIES, 1914-21

The following list of agencies, arranged in alphabetical order regardless of size or importance, is intended to be used with the recently issued List of Federal World War Agencies, 1914-20, which showed the units in their hierarchical relationship. It is hoped that it may also have independent value. Both lists have been prepared primarily for use as working tools in connection with the compilation of a Handbook of Federal World War Agencies, 1914-21, which is now under way. This Handbook will contain brief descriptive statements on the organization, functions, and records of each of the agencies appearing in this list. Since several additional months will be required to complete the Handbook, it was felt that the issuance of this list might meanwhile serve a useful purpose. An effort has been made to increase its value to officials concerned with the records of the war of 1914-18 by placing an asterisk before names of those agencies whose records, in whole or in part, are known to be in The National Archives at the present time. It should be kept in mind, however, that additional records of this period are being transferred almost daily and also that The National Archives can often furnish information as to the present location of records not in its custody.

Records of all the major emergency agencies of the war of 1914-18 are now in The National Archives, with the single exception of those of the War Trade Board. An asterisk could be placed before the names of such agencies without hesitation. It has often been difficult, however, to determine the situation with respect to the files of lesser units within an agency, especially where the records were consolidated into central files or where large accessions, supposedly representing the remaining records of a major agency, have not been thoroughly analyzed. In many instances the names of lesser units within such agencies have been marked with an asterisk because there is a reasonable certainty that the records are in the building. It should be observed also that where the actual records of an agency are missing, information concerning the activities of that agency can almost certainly be found in the records of superior units in the hierarchy or among the informational files of other agencies.

Since the present list represents a later stage in work on the Handbook than the first, the content of the first is not exactly duplicated. Many units that have lately come to light as performing war-related work have been added, the terminal date of the list has been extended to that of the peace resolution of 1921, and many units lacking meaningful names have been omitted. Under the alphabetical arrangement one can discover readily many of the units, permanent or emergency, that were concerned with a particular commodity or subject. (The 16 entries for units dealing with cotton on page 24 may be mentioned as an example of this.) Some names are given in both their original and in one or more inverted forms; and in cases where inversion fails to bring out subjects buried in titles, the subject is listed separately, followed by the name of the agency concerned. This list thus brings together all units dealing with a particular commodity or subject insofar as this can be done by means of the words in their titles.

The effort to make the list as complete as possible has resulted in certain units appearing more than once with slightly different names or with different superior agencies. Every unit that was under a superior agency is followed by the name of that agency in order to enable the user to find the unit and its associated units, if any, in the hierarchical list. (For example, Exports Bureau, WTB, appears in the hierarchical list under War Trade Board.) It should be borne in mind, however, that further study of the units may well necessitate making changes in their hierarchical relationships and in the elimination of certain units found to have had only a paper existence. Such changes will be embodied in the completed Handbook.
